In that state, share tenancy implies close supervision on the part of the owner; cash tenancy, freedom from such control. It has been well said that the passage of the negro from the former to the latter class marks not his greater ability but his greater opportunity to declare his independence from the close supervision of the landlord. It is the escaping from supervision, not the larger opportunity of profits that the negro has in mind in shifting from the position of wage earner or share tenant to renter. The history of the normal negro agricultural laborer is about as follows. He begins as a youth working for wages. As soon as he has a family that can be utilized for field work he becomes a share tenant. Under the semi-compulsion of this system, he makes good profits, and, if he has any capacity for saving, can in a short time buy a mule and a few tools, and set up as a renter. So great has been the competition for laborers and so completely have the negroes had the upper hand in this matter, that negro wage earners and share Carver, T.
